M THE MAGNETIC POLE

© 1967 BY WESTERN PUBLISHING COMPANY, INC.

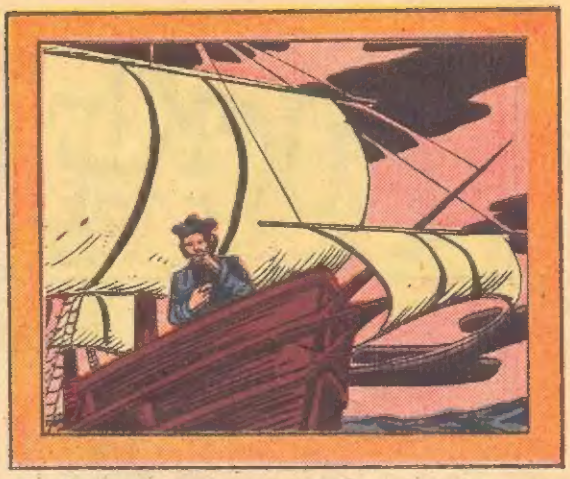
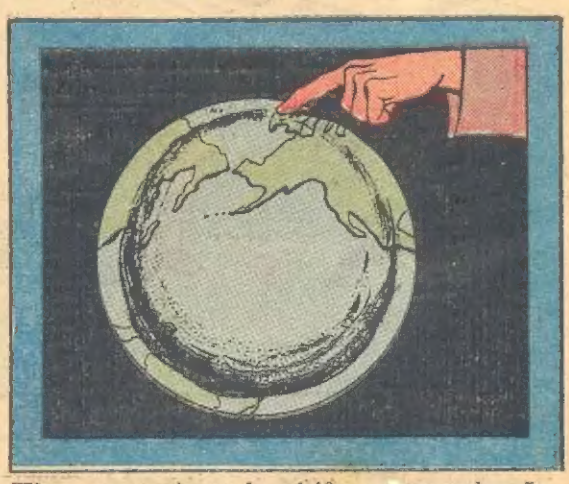
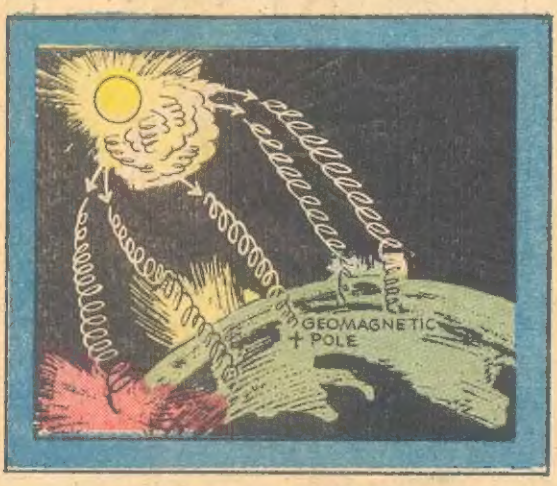


Early explorers noticed that compass readings did not point true north, varying up to 40° west off Greenland.

In 1600, William Gilbert of England studied these compass deviations, using a lodestone model of Earth.



The magnetic pole shifts constantly. In 1580 it was 10° east of true north. In 1945 it was 76° N. lat., 102° W. long.



Solar flares bombard Earth's magnetic field with atomic particles. Ionizing atmospheric gases, they create the aurora.

Solar flares create magnetic storms, distorting the magnetic fields and upsetting radio and telegraph communications.
